How to Boost Your Memory with Brain Training If you want to learn how to boost your memory, the first thing you should know is that learning and memory go together. Learning is the process of picking up new things, or acquiring new knowledge. Memory is how we store this information and make it available to us, so we can recall it. You have probably heard of the latest brain training methods that attempt to teach us all about how our brains work, and you may find yourself wondering whether or not these methods will actually help you learn and retain more. Brain training can be considered as a general term for any method or technique that aims to improve brain function or performance. Brain training can be anything from a method of brain exercise, such as running or playing chess, to learning a foreign language or treating an anxiety problem. What does it mean to "train the brain?" Your brain is made up of billions of neurons and our brains are continuously learning and updating. We need to continually develop and adapt to new ideas and stimuli, otherwise we could fall behind the learning curve. How do we learn and adapt? As we study a new subject or learn a new skill, we are constantly recreating and re-structuring our brains, so we can remember it. This recoding and reconstruction of our brains is called plasticity, and it is how we learn and adapt to new information. Does brain training actually help us learn and retain new things? As we build up new knowledge and understanding, our brains continue to release dopamine, a pleasure-inducing chemical. This process makes us feel good and energizes us. Dopamine is also linked to addiction, because its high levels increase our interest in something. Dopamine, therefore, is important for learning and memory, but there is little evidence to suggest that brain training has any effect on it. What does it mean to get better at something? If we are getting better at something, we are learning more and more effectively. We are learning new things and adapting the things that we already know. This type of learning, or working smarter, is called neuroplasticity. How is memory formed? Learning and remembering new things is based on a chain of events that starts in the hippocampus, the memory-forming area of our brain. Your hippocampus is made up of many neurons and is located just behind your ears. One important
